Who are interfaith volunteer caregivers? Simply, people of all ages—the youngest is about five, the oldest is over one hundred—who wish to put their faith into action through volunteer work. Further, 76 percent are recruited directly from congregations and see this activity as their ministry. They often tell the directors of the programs that what they do is between themselves and their God. They want neither recognition nor reimbursement.

On the next page of this newsletter you will read about one interfaith volunteer caregiving organization called Project DANA. These interfaith volunteers help everyone regardless of age, race or religion, and they do so without any attempt to proselytize. They do not replace formal service providers in the community but rather fill in the gaps. Motivated by faith, the volunteers quickly develop a lasting relationship with the people they serve and often become family to one another. They receive training from professionals so that they are comfortable, confident, and competent when called upon to provide assistance.

The volunteers offer a broad range of services. Rose Nakamura is the administrator of the home office of Project Dana in Hawaii. Begun in 1990, Project Dana was based on the Buddhist principle of dana, which in Sanskrit means “selfless giving” of the time and energy. At the time of program start-up, Mrs. Nakamura and Shim Kanazawa, the founder, had 400 volunteers who served 600 persons. Today the program has 850 volunteers and serves 1,000 participants every year with twenty-eight sites in the Hawaiian Islands, two in California, and two in Japan.

Take a moment to think about this….if we in our own congregations could set up a volunteer program to assist each other, especially those that are aging and/or disabled. We could spend two to four hours each week reaching out to those that are hurting. Our actions could make a huge difference in combating the isolation and challenges faced by many caregivers.

Congregations could bond together in the cause of caregiving. Theological differences could be set aside to form a coalition dedicated to the ministry of caregiving. With these efforts, an effective program may be created that responds to needs both within the congregation and in the wider community.

I had the privilege in mid September, to be the keynote speaker at the Project DANA caregiving conference and 25th Anniversary Celebration. On the next page you will read about the wonderful activities they do as a volunteer faith-in-action organization.
Project DANA is an interfaith cooperative effort providing support services for frail elderly and disabled persons. Through volunteers from congregations, putting faith into action...the principle of Dana or selfless giving of time and energy, providing compassion and care is the project’s mission...they provide care and compassion without the desire for recognition or expression of appreciation.

Project DANA trains volunteer coordinators from partner congregations for initiating or strengthening their ministries of caring. Next they provide training and education for volunteers within the congregations. They encourage congregations to care for their own members and reach out to the community. Many agencies and individuals give referrals to Project DANA. Then they match a volunteer to those frail elderly needing assistance. They also coordinate the programs with the many different congregations.

Here are some facts about Project DANA:
- Founded in 1989.
- Comprised of a coalition of 32 churches/temples across Hawaii.
- 850 volunteers serve 1,000 persons totaling 50,000 hours annually.
- Recipient of national awards and recognitions:
  - The first Rosalynn Carter Caregiving Award (1993).
  - Best Practice program by national senior Volunteers Summit (1998).
  - SHARE Award from GlaxoSmithKline of Pennsylvania Institute on Aging (2001).

Project DANA recruits and trains volunteers to assist the frail and elderly with:
- Friendly home visits
- Respite services
- Transportation to medical appointments, grocery shopping, and religious services
- Telephone visits
- Minor home repairs, light housekeeping
- Home safety assessment/education
- Family caregivers support

Volunteers are sensitive to diverse cultures and traditions. They receive initial and continual training and education from the project, and are managed by trained volunteer coordinators from partner congregations.

A few comments from one of the Mission groups:
- Serving the elders while being mindful of their dignity
- Giving back to the community of elders who have given so much to us
- Developing deepening friendships
- Enjoying the elders who are amazing people
- Gaining a sense of satisfaction from caring for others

Daisy Emerson
Georgia Family Caregiver of the Year

This year’s Georgia Family Caregiver of the Year learned caregiving skills at her Mama’s knee as she watched her provide care for family members and neighbors through the years. When the time came for her dear Mother to need care, she was ready and willing. Even with caring for her mother while working a full time job, her caregiving umbrella stretched far and wide as she helped out other relatives and neighbors as well. Just like most family caregivers, she was always too busy moving from one essential task to the next to think about how she was doing herself. But she had a best friend Roosevelt who was paying attention. And when he saw the stress mounting he would swoop in and take this dedicated caregiver for a ride around the country side. The knowing eyes of a mother saw more than friendship between the two. During her mother’s final hospital stay, she pressed their hands together and expressed her gratitude knowing they had each other to lean on.

Less than a year later, best friends became husband and wife. But of course, that is not the end of this love story. You see the family caregiver of the year once again was ready and willing when her new husband was diagnosed with Pick’s disease not so long after their marriage. And for the years that have followed, they have walked this journey together. She sets a beautiful example for all caregivers in that she eagerly participates in programs and services offered, such as the Chronic Disease Self-Management Program, classes and workshops offered through the Alzheimer’s Association and the Area Agency on Aging in her area. It touched so many hearts to learn that RCI REACH played a role in sustaining the caregiver of the year in caring for husband. She continues to use strategies she learned from REACH such as the Power of Music and Pleasant Events. Finally, the family caregiver of the year is a staunch advocate for caregivers. From participating in the development of a local caregiver institute to speaking directly with legislators and even the governor, this advocate is always working to improve the lives of caregivers around the state of Georgia.

Angela Booze
Para-professional Caregiver of the Year

Two words come to mind when reading the nomination essay submitted for the Para-professional Caregiver of the Year: Transformative and heebee jeebees. Transformative… that would be the word to describe the impact the 2014 Para-professional Caregiver of the Year has on the families she serves. H teebee Jeebees… that is how the committee felt as they read the description of the challenges she has faced in serving families and their caregivers. Home maintenance and housekeeping are often the first activities to suffer when caregiving responsibilities take up so much time and energy. Sometimes home health care workers encounter situations that are just downright disgusting. Most of us would simply turn and run when faced with such a mess. Not so with the winner though. She has proven to be more than a trooper. In fact, she is something akin to a saint. Descriptions of the conditions she faced were so bad they were hard to read about much less deal with daily, however she has not only faced the problems, but completely turned them around for the better.

In the words of her supervisor:

“Since she has been their aide, not only has the condition of their environment changed but they look like a completely different couple.”

Instead of complaining or making the families feel badly for their situation, she simply goes about the work of making things right. All the while setting an example for the family caregivers she serves. You know, we often forget the added value of the home health care workers who come into our homes to provide services. They can also serve as trainers and educators for families. That is certainly the case with this home health care worker. When a family caregiver does not show the appropriate level of involvement, she works with them and nurtures them into a better understanding of what is needed and how to provide it.

Modeling good caregiving skills and compassion can make all the difference. As one family caregiver states about her service:

“She never gives up on my parents. I love the fact that she is very attentive to them and you can tell that what she does is very genuine and from the heart.”

Mary Frances Duren

Georgia Volunteer Caregiver of the Year

Surprising thing about family caregivers... when their caregiver job is done, they generally tend to find someone new to care for. The Georgia Volunteer Caregiver of the Year did just that. After years of caring for first her mother and then her sister, she began a special ministry through her church for members of the congregation with special needs. Her Sunday School Class includes members who are challenged mentally, physically, and developmentally. Everyone is welcomed and made to feel special in the very best way.

Health concerns and mobility issues have not slowed down this volunteer dynamo. Since her retirement in 1999, she has faced down cancer without skipping a beat in her volunteer activities.

One good idea tends to spark another. Under the leadership of our award winner, a special summer camp is now offered for the church members with special needs. And just to be sure nobody gets bored during the rest of the year, every month she provides respite care for those who are developmentally disabled so that their caregivers can enjoy a night out. What a tremendous gift to the families in her community.

On December 9, 2014 the CARE-NET Coalition met in Macon, GA at the Methodist Home for Children and Youth. The guest speaker was Laura George, an Emergency Management Disability Liaison. She has developed a plan to assist caregivers of people with disabilities, the elderly and others in case an emergency should happen. For more visit Laura’s website: www.laurageorge-emdl.com

After Laura’s presentation the group broke for lunch and time for fellowship. The Children’s home was decorated so beautifully for Christmas.

When the group gathered again, Elaine Larkin, Training and CARE-NET Coordinator shared the calendar for 2015 and led the open discussion about Caregiver of the Year nominations for 2015 and other items for the upcoming year. Next, Dr. Leisa Easom, Executive Director shared with everyone current and future endeavors at RCI.

Dr. Easom adjourned the meeting wishing everyone a blessed Christmas and Happy New Year.

I Heart Caregivers
At the end of my grandmother’s remarkable 94 years of life, my aunt moved her into her home to be with her and care for her. My aunt did not call herself a caregiver, but a daughter. My mother was there when my widowed brother was discharged from a two-month hospital stay after a dozen surgeries resulting from an industrial accident. She did not call herself a caregiver, but a mom.
The contributions of family caregivers should not be overlooked, and in fact they are championed through organizations like RCI and AARP. Caregiving is now a common family dynamic, as Mrs. Rosalynn Carter speaks to in her statement that there are only four kinds of people in the world – those who have been caregivers, are currently caregivers, who will be caregivers and who will need caregivers.
Family caregivers do remarkable things every day to care for their loved ones – but it is not without challenges. More than three in 10 family caregivers are very or extremely emotionally stressed. For family caregivers who provide assistance, sacrifice time away from family and friends, or live with the loved one for whom they are caring, stress is, not surprisingly, increased.
On an upside, when my husband’s mom came to live with us, it gave him an opportunity to spend more time with her than since he had left the family home at 18. He experienced again her sense of humor, and enjoyed having the time to listen to stories about past family vacations and do-it-yourself projects his dad regularly took on with his brothers-in-law. My husband did not call himself a caregiver, but a son.
To recognize those who give with their hearts to help their loved ones, AARP has launched a new initiative, “I Heart Caregivers” – aarp.org/iheartcaregivers – so family caregivers across America can share their stories and make their voices heard.
You may have an experience that talks to benefits of the Care Act, which supports family caregivers when their loved one goes into the hospital, and provides training on medical tasks they will need to perform once their loved one returns. Or share how your employer supports you in using your medical leave to take your mom to a doctor’s visit; how a nurse became your family’s lifesaver; or how a neighbor steps in every Wednesday to provide you with a well deserved break.
Please take a moment to visit aarp.org/iheartcaregivers to find out more about family caregivers in Georgia and other states. You will see yourself in some of the stories, and be reminded how remarkable these spouses, brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, friends, daughters, sons – these caregivers (you) – really are.
And then take another moment to share your story!
